Robert Friedmann, helped found Freedom Trail

By Allen Geenoy

Robert F. Friedmann, who dared much of his life to preserve American history by helping to create the Freedom Trail in Boston, died of heart disease in a rehabilitation center in Oakland, Calif. He was 79 and had lived in Maine.

Mr. Friedmann believed that knowledge of history would prevent the repetition of tragedies of the past.

A veteran of the Navy, he was in the flag office at the Pentagon during World War II. After the war, he worked in Washington, D.C., at the National Archives, where he helped to establish the Freedom Trail.

Mr. Friedmann was a teenager when World War II began, and he was drafted into the U.S. Army in 1943. He served in Europe, where he helped to establish the Freedom Trail.

IN MEMORIAM

Robert Friedmann (right), at Freedom Foundation meeting.

Robert Friedmann, who helped found the Freedom Trail in Boston, died of heart disease in a rehabilitation center in Oakland, Calif. He was 79 and had lived in Maine.

Mr. Friedmann believed that knowledge of history would prevent the repetition of tragedies of the past.

A veteran of the Navy, he was in the flag office at the Pentagon during World War II. After the war, he worked in Washington, D.C., at the National Archives, where he helped to establish the Freedom Trail.

Mr. Friedmann was a teenager when World War II began, and he was drafted into the U.S. Army in 1943. He served in Europe, where he helped to establish the Freedom Trail.

IN MEMORIAM

Robert Friedmann (right), at Freedom Foundation meeting.

Robert Friedmann, who helped found the Freedom Trail in Boston, died of heart disease in a rehabilitation center in Oakland, Calif. He was 79 and had lived in Maine.

Mr. Friedmann believed that knowledge of history would prevent the repetition of tragedies of the past.

A veteran of the Navy, he was in the flag office at the Pentagon during World War II. After the war, he worked in Washington, D.C., at the National Archives, where he helped to establish the Freedom Trail.

Mr. Friedmann was a teenager when World War II began, and he was drafted into the U.S. Army in 1943. He served in Europe, where he helped to establish the Freedom Trail.